NYCBL PRIME STATS:

ANY DODGING THE DODGERS?

You really don’t have to look far to see how impressive Hornell has been down the stretch of the 2015 NYCBL season. A trip over to the “League Leaders” page will give you a taste. In the six statistical categories that are featured on that page, 10 of the 36 places open for leaders in batting average, home runs, RBI, wins, strikeouts, and ERA are reserved by someone on the Hornell roster. An extended look on the team side of things proves more of the same. The Dodgers lead in team batting average, on base percentage, and slugging percentage, boasting a slash line of .298/.386/.384. Scarier still is that if you took the 2nd place totals from each of those same categories, you’d arrive with a respectable yet less-impressive slash of .271/.354/.363. Run production? Hornell has 39 more runs scored (227) than the second-place Twins (188). That’s with six less games played than Geneva. That’s an average score of 5.82 to 4.37, or a run and a half difference per game between the top two offenses in the league. Looking for an Achilles Heel? There is the fact that currently Hornell ranks eighth in the league in ERA. But one must also consider that it’s eighth with a team ERA of 3.09. That’s hardly what one would consider a glaring weakness. There is consistency in one flaw; in their 11 losses, Hornell has produced just 30 runs for an average of 2.73, and has been shut out three times in that stretch. If you want to beat the Champs, you better dodge their bats.
